Justice Barrett said feelingly:
"I shall be very glad that such a minute be made. There is no one the news of whose death the Court would receive with greater regret and sorrow than that of Mr. Whitney, My acquaintance with him went back to the time when he was Corporation Counsel, and I well remember that for six weeks he and his associate, Francis Lynde Stetson, sat before me in the room in the other end of this building trying the great case of the executrix of the architect of this Court-House against the city for commissions. The case took six weeks to try, and in it he displayed the most extraordinary capacity in the grouping of the most minute and complex facts with regard to every item that went into the make-up of this great building. It was a case in which there was the display of the most splendid ability on both sides, but I must say the ability preponderated upon his side and resulted in a verdict in favor of the city.
